

He has played pool since he was a kid. It was one of his favorite games and loved to show people his tricks. He loved to compete with someone who's good at it, and I never saw him losing.

We get stress from our lives and each of us have different ways to release. Bating was his way to release stress and he enjoyed it a lot.

He often went to north market and had Vietnamese noodle. It was our favorite.

He has dreams and passion. Army is mandatory for Korean men, and he has to go through military service as others go forward for their future.

Everyone has their own treasures. I value my camera the most, and he loves his car. He learned engineering when he was in high school and spent 2 years with Evolution in Columbus. He told me that the car became his foe and felt sad to be seperated.

He's major is industrial design and he's passionate about it. I've seen many of his works, and he is very talented. He feels sad that he has to stop his passion for two years, but he will never give up on it.

He liked to be involved with other people. He doesn't believe in god, but he believes in his friends and family. He was always there for he's loved ones.

He drinks a lot. We often spend nights by drinking with people and laugh a lot. He offered me icecream dipped Guinness every time I went to his house, and I'll definitely miss the taste.

He said the number of cigarettes that he smoke increases everyday as the time comes. I want him to quit before he gets cancer, but I cannot not say anything about it because I smoke more than him.

Sometimes he gets frustrated when he calls his parents because they are worried. It makes him feel even more burdened.

He doesn't want to let go of her hand.

For two years they were together.
